

Copyright on Master's Thesis at the Faculty of Medicine

Your rights

A master's thesis comes within the scope of the Norwegian Copyright Act's statutory provisions. As an author, you can decide whether your thesis should be made publically accessible or whether it should be subject to restrictions on lending and usage. The latter means that copies of your thesis held by NTNU may not be lent out without your specific consent each time.

What you must consider

We encourage you to make your master's thesis accessible for the public. If you nevertheless want to subject the thesis to a restriction on lending and usage, you should consider the necessity of doing this, preferably in consultation with your primary supervisor. Before you make your decision, we kindly ask you to mark the following points:

1. Previous experience shows that in the vast majority of cases where someone wants to borrow a master's thesis subject to restrictions on lending, the author has given consent. However, in many instances the author has been difficult to find after she or he has left the university.
2. Most filed materials which are kept in archives and libraries inaccessible to the public, are subject to restrictions on lending for a limited period of time.
3. The most common reason for subjecting a master's thesis to a restriction on lending is that the author plans to use the material for publishing in later work(s). If this is the case for your master's thesis, you should choose a restriction of limited duration (see next page).
4. Restrictions for unlimited time should be used only if it is absolutely necessary, for instance if your master's thesis contains sensitive information about human beings.

We ask you to fill out and sign page 2 of this document, and to submit it along with the printed version of your master's thesis and the form for registration to final master's degree examination.

Right of cancellation

You may at any time cancel the permission to lend your master's thesis, or decide that a restriction on lending and usage should be suspended. Contact the Faculty of Medicine at NTNU if you want to change your decision.
